Not illustrated. 1888 Excerpt: . . . of my acquaintance, who was much afraid of bees, was completely cured of her fear by the following incident: A swarm having come off, I observed the queen alight by herself at a little distance from the apiary (bee-house). I immediately called my little friend, that I might show her the queen. She wished to see her more closely. So after having caused her to put on her gloves, I gave the queen into her hand. We were in an instant surrounded by all the bees of the swarm. I encouraged the girl to be steady, bidding her be silent and fear nothing. I then made her stretch out her right hand, which held the queen, and covered her head and shoulders with a very thin handkerchief. The swarm soon fixed on her hand and hung from it as from the branch of a tree. The little girl was delighted beyond measure, and the spectators were charmed with the interesting spectacle. At length I brought a hive, and, shaking the swarm from her hand, it was lodged in safety, and without inflicting a single wound. The life of the first brood of workers is about six weeks. Those hatched later in the season live longer, and a few endure the winter. The queen may live four years. The drones, which number about one thirtieth part of a hive, are all slaughtered by the workers, during the latter part of the summer. They are of no use...
