Excerpt: . . . their tone but after a perfect recovery. This flaccidity has a very peculiar effect on the face; it is that which confounds the expression of the countenance. CHAPTER VIII. Pulmonary Diseases. The lungs have not as yet been considered by us as a simple tissue, because they are an organ; nevertheless, in pathology, we must regard them as such, although, there does not exist in any part of the body any thing analogous to them. They differ especially from other organs in their diseases. Their inflammation, for example, has nothing in common with that of others: the progress of it is more rapid; the pus has a very peculiar nature and odour. Tubercles exclusively belong to this, organ, as well as calcu-lous concretions. The diseases of the lungs are extremely common, which results without doubt from the close relations of this organ with exterior bodies. We shall first speak of its essential affections, and then of its sympathies. The similar small tumours which occur in the liver, spleen, peritoneum, and even in the heart, are by Laennec and others denominated tubercle. Thass. V ARTICLE I. Inflammation of the Lungs. Peripneumonia is the principal of the affections of the lungs. This inflammation is more frequent than that of the pleura, it commonly depends upon a sudden change from heat to cold. Whatever may be its cause, the following are its phenomena: its attack begins with chills, fever, pain in the side, more or less intense....
