The Subject-Matter of Experimental Psychology. Anything that concerns our own dear Self is of intense interest to us. Among the things that concern each ones Self, the most fascinating are those which are not open to the gaze of all, and of which no one can have any immediate knowledge except him who experiences them. Such are the thoughts, feelings, fancies, memories, moods, aspirations, plans, wishes, resolutions, remorses, hopes, joys, sorrows, fears, likes and dislikes: in short, the whole drama which is enacted within the sanctum of each ones private Self. These internal experiences are the subject-matter of experimental psychology. They are the objects with which experimental psychology is directly concerned. Indirectly, however, anything that is capable of throwing light on these internal experiences--inasmuch as it is capable of doing so--comes within the scope of experimental psychology. Prominent among the things that can throw light on our subject-matter proper are the bodily conditions under which our mental life actually occurs. Consequently in the course of our study we shall make an occasional sally into the field of physiology, particularly the physiology of the nervous system of man. By doing so we do not obliterate the boundary lines between psychology and physiology. We rather take into account the fact which has been recognized ever since the time of Aristotle, namely, that these bodily conditions are important factors of our mental life. Our mode of procedure, then, is in principle the same as that...
