CHAPTER in Postarmistice Methods of Adjusting Contracts As soon as the cessation of hostilities releases the economic activities of a nation from the main business of military effort, a sort of universal let-down ensues. The relations of government to private interests undergo a fundamental change. In war time the spectre of commandeering power always overshadowed the business arrangements. Now that spell had been broken. The relation of contractor and government shifted to a legal-economic basis in which a larger measure of bargaining freedom existed. As soon as the armistice of November u, 1918, became a fact, this newer status gave a different character to the war contract relationship. For this reason an entirely different kind of machinery had to be called into use. Out of an era in which speed of execution of contract commitments was the essential consideration, tens of thousands of business concerns suddenly found themselves in a realm of negotiation, of cost accounting and of claims, in which the government had almost over night set up a specially contrived mechanism of claims boards to facilitate liquidation of its obligations without resort to litigation. 1 Reconstruction was a word on everybodys tongue. Not only how but how soon might we expect to get back to the paths of free industry again In this situation the question of the methods to be followed by which assets tied up in governmental contracts might be rendered quickly available for employment in commercial enterprise became the question...
